

Title: Information as a Fundamental Construct

This brief paper argues that information, rather than matter or energy, should be considered the most fundamental constituent of reality. We explore the implications of this view for physics, computation, and consciousness.

If observations define state changes, then the sequence of observations defines the history and structure of a system. The "energy" associated with an observation relates to the amount of information change it represents.