

Title: Introduction to Computational Linguistics

Computational linguistics involves the study of language from a computational perspective. Key tasks include parsing, semantic representation, and machine translation.

Natural Language Processing (NLP) is the applied arm, building systems that can understand and generate human language. Embeddings play a crucial role in representing word and sentence meaning for these systems. Semantic similarity is a core metric.